

The Humiliation of the Great Satan

Question:

On the basis of which signs and indicators do you say that America was defeated in the 40-day war?

The President of the United States and his military-security team imagined that by designing an all-out war, they could close the file of the Islamic Republic of Iran forever. The extensive media propaganda, unprecedented military threats, and the presence of warships in the waters of the region all indicated that Washington had entered a new phase of confrontation. But what happened in practice bore no resemblance to the White House's dreams. The "Third Unfinished War," or the "40-Day Battle," not only failed to achieve the enemy's objectives, but became one of America's greatest strategic defeats since the end of World War II. In what follows, we review 7 clear signs of this great defeat of the Devil and Iran's decisive victory.

First Sign: The Overthrow of the System

America's most important and strategic objective in this war was "regime change" in Iran. Trump had repeatedly said that the Islamic Republic must be erased from the face of time. But after 40 days of bombing, not only was the system not overthrown, its domestic popularity also increased. In this field, the enemy was practically rendered "helpless," because all of its scenarios for infiltrating Iran's power structure failed one after another. From then on, "regime change" became an impossible dream for the Devil and his partners.

Second Sign: The Destruction of Iran's Military Capability

Trump and his generals had declared with complete confidence that "we will destroy Iran's defensive capability by military force." They repeatedly told the media that Iran's missile bases, air-defense systems, and key military facilities had been destroyed. But after 40 days, not only were they unable to destroy Iran's military capability, they themselves were forced to acknowledge in their confidential reports that they would "take this dream to the grave." Iran's missile deterrence remained firmly in place, and the country's military power was rebuilt more intelligently than before.

Third Sign: A Historic Disgrace in the Nuclear File

One of America's main pretexts for launching the war was Iran's nuclear file. They chanted: "There is no longer any need for a political agreement such as the JCPOA; we will remove nuclear materials from Iran by military force and force Iran to surrender." But what happened in practice? Not only was no nuclear material removed from Iran, but Iran took several nuclear steps forward. In this field, Washington committed such a "historic disgrace" that even Western media called it the greatest failure of America's military diplomacy.

Fourth Sign: Missile Restrictions

The Americans insisted that Iran must accept "the restriction of its missile capability, whether through language or through force." They imagined that after this war, Iran would surrender at the negotiating table and place its hand over its own missile capability. But not only did this not happen, there is no sign of missile restrictions in the 10-point plan that Iran drafted and Trump was forced to accept. This means a complete and unprecedented defeat for America's bullying strategy.

Fifth Sign: The Suffocation of Separatists in the Region

One of the most devilish parts of the enemy's plan was activating separatist groups along Iran's borders. By bombing border regions and sending weapons, they intended to "bring an end to Greater Iran." But the crushing response of Iran's armed forces was such that these groups not only failed to advance; they were suffocated in the bud. Today, nothing remains of those separatists except a "historic lesson"; a lesson for anyone who imagines that, with foreign support, they can separate even one span of Iranian soil.

Sixth Sign: The Strait of Hormuz

With the presence of its massive fleet in the Persian Gulf, America had promised that it would "open the Strait of Hormuz by military force." They imagined that Iran would not dare to close the Strait. But in practice, not only was the Strait of Hormuz controlled by Iran until the end of the war, America was forced to accept "Iran's precondition for determining a new legal regime for this strait as the basis of negotiations." This means Washington's strategic retreat in the most important energy waterway in the world.

Seventh Sign: The Survival of the Islamic Republic

The slogan "The Islamic Republic must go" echoed throughout all Western media. But after 40 days of war, the opposite was proven: not only was the system not removed, but it was "this very system" that rejected the enemy's 15-point plan in one stroke and "seated its own 10-point plan in its place." This was a complete political-military victory for Iran and a historic humiliation for Trump and his team.
